Question1: I am a professional classical musician. I am opposed to subsidies for those in the arts, and I am opposed to subsidies for those in the business of agriculture. We all assume the risks and rewards of our own chosen professions. How can outsiders decide whether or not we should be in our chosen professions and how much we deserve to earn in them? The disease of social engineering must stop somewhere.

Question2: If Cubans can grow sugar cane cheaper than Americans, let consumers buy from them. I will worry about my own personal trade deficit, which, by the way, could just as well be called a capital surplus.

Question3:

Question4: Farm policy can best achieve conservation and policy goals by working to extend property rights to air and water, in particular, so that pollution becomes a tort. Without property rights considerations, this whole issue becomes subject to self-righteous, emotional pleading, and starts to look anti-business and anti-human, rather than pro-environment.

Question5: Government at all levels should stay out of the way, and let local interests and consumer demand determine how resources are used.

Question6: They should not be addressed.
