Question1: The price of farm land should reflect the economy of it's region not the inflated profits for what may or may not be produced on that land.

Question2: The US should only accept products that meet very high standards (ie produce that has not been sprayed with pesticides banned in the US) and the US should improve our own standards so that the citizens of the United States will be healthier. For example working to eliminate our dependence on synthetic pesitcides and genetically engineered plants.

Question3: The policy must be flexible and accomodate small family farmers. One size does not fit all!

Question4: We must work to eliminate our dependence on synthetic pesticides and genetically engineered plants. These tactics work only in the short term and only benefit the bottom line of major corporations. Organic agriculture is sustainable agriculture that gives back tyo the earth so farms can thrive for all time.

Question5: Establish a task force that literally visits small family farmers and listens to their challenges. Their problems can only be addressed when they have been identified and acknowledged.

Question6: This should be the most important facet of the 2007 farm bill. The USDA can learn how to implement sustainable agriculture by learning from those farms in the US and around the world that currently farm organically.
