Question1: Government intervention always results in unintended consequences. When these unintended consequences are realized and frowned upon the logical answer would be to repeal the intervention. However, the typical government response is further intervention to try and "neutalize" the first intervention. Then, of course, the new intervention has consequences, and so we add another layer of correctional intervention. This needs to stop. Let the market decide what the price of butter should be and who we should buy it from.
