Question4: It is vitally important that policy include sustainable support for urban and community forestry. As populations continue the pressure on urban sprawl, green infrastructure such as well planned tree placement and supporting maintenance must be integral components. This includes the vast amount of lands interfacing traditional agriculture and newly developing city communities. The benefits of healthy urban forests, such as storm water runoff retention and air quality, and general human health have been dramatically quantified by recent scientific research. Managing urban forest landscapes is "urban farming", and should be fully supported by federal farm policy. Thank you.
