Question4: Urban and community forestry involves creating, in cities and towns, the plant-related benefits that are more or less taken for granted in rural areas. This work, carried on by a thin network of dedicated professionals across the US, usually depends on budgets grossly out of proportion to the importance of the mission. Those of us in the profession share our knowledge and experience daily with other communities that need our help. However, without federal encouragement, many communities do not comprehend the extent to which their own economies and welfare depend on the benefits that we provide. Please be sure to include support for urban and community forestry in the farm bill. Thank you.
