Question3:

Question4: Since the public is renting land that is placed in the conservation reserve program, this land should be open to public hunting. All new CRP contracts should have a public access clause included. The taxpayers have spent billions on conservation subsidies and deserve to have access to the land they are renting. Public access would create greater support for continuing conservation subsidy programs and provide tremendous economic benefits.

Question5: Requiring that all new CRP contracts be open for public hunting would greatly increase tourism in rural communities. It would also create a tremendous nationwide economic benefit by providing hunting opportunities in states that have little public recreational land.
