Question1: Half of all land in the United States is dedicated to agriculture, something that makes issues relating to farm policy and land management critical for protecting wildlife. The National Wildlife Federation has long been at work behind the scenes urging legislation that offers financial incentives for farmers to set aside parts of their land to benefit wildlife, as well as encourage smart land-use ethics. In fact, the 2002 Farm Bill included numerous conservation programs with environmentally-friendly incentives to farmers.

This bill is up for reauthorization. We ask that safeguards be in place to protect the environment so wildlife can be protected. Thank you for your concern.
