Question1:

Question2: Many European as well as American consumers are concerned about humane farming practices, organic and GMO free foods, antibiotic and hormone free meat. Intense confinement and drugging practices prevalent in today's factory farming is probably most uncivilized aspect of modern animal husbandry.

Question3: Today's farming subsidies favor big conglomerates: biggest offenders in pollution, cruel and inhumane treatment of animals and producers of unsafe foods. Small family farms are unable to compete against those giants, yet family farm is the answer to many problems of today's agriculture, they should be helped and assisted in any way possible (of course, barring outright waste of public money, like paying farmer NOT to grow certain crop).

Question4: The first step towards protection of American soil and air would be elimination of factory farms - lagoons of raw sewage, sickening smell of dry commercial feedlots (not pastures!), water sources used up or contaminated to keep those uncivilized operations running - cost of cheap meat is too costly for environment.

Question5: All the attention should be directed at family farms, not Conagras of the country, farmers should be able to submit requests locally to the State officer for USDA and after consideration the most worthy (or needy) would be helped. That might also help to clear some dead weight - like farmers growing cotton in the areas never ment or intended for cotton because of climate and soil considerations.

Question6: The best marketing in USA and abroad would be untainted, healthy meat of animal raised in humane conditions, worthy of First World country standards, and produce that would have the taste of advertised product (meaning: tomatoes would taste like tomatoes, and strawberries like strawberries)
