Question1:

Question2: Americans care about how farm animals are treated at all stages of the animals' lives, from birth to slaughter. The United States should adopt a set of minimum standards that eliminates practices that are inhumane, such as battery cages for hens. Many people, when learning of these practices, stop eating meat altogether.

Question3: The USDA should stop providing financial assistance to producers that employ inhumane practices on their animals.

Question4: Factory farming in particular contributes largely to runoff and pollution of our water bodies. The USDA can counter-act this by proposing a minimum space allowance that lets animals move freely and behave as they would in nature, which would cut down on the amount of animals per farm, thereby reducing runoff and related problems.
