Question1: There's a radio ad that states Farmers tried to increase there profits by farming more land. Eventually, they learned that farming productive land led to profits. Unfortunately, current subsidies encourages farming more land resulting in lower grain prices and creating the need for more subsidies. It is time to put more supply and demand back into the equation. Both to determine grain prices and land values.

Question2: We need a correction to inflated costs that resulted from subsidies. Prices are inflated from the land to the harvest equipment. We need to let market influences work more. As long as there are subsidies for grain production, there will be inflated costs.

Question3: Let's reward effective use of land and not over production of land. Set production goals. If land does not meet the goals, don't reward.

Question4: The farm policy needs to focus whether land is useful for crop production. If not, subsidize alternate uses of land instead of subsidizing poor grain production of this land.
