

Ephraim Leibtag

Ephraim Leibtag is Deputy Director for Research in ERS's Food Economics Division. He is currently responsible for directing the research program of the Division as well as providing guidance and leadership for all Division staff publications and presentations. His personal research has covered retail food prices and the dynamics of retail food markets with specific research interests including forecasting and analyzing trends in retail food prices, estimating the impact of changes in the retail food environment on consumers, and modeling the pass-through of input cost changes to wholesale and retail prices. Ephraim's work has been used in presentations to government officials, policy analysts, the research community, and other public audiences. He has also been the subject of television, radio, newspaper, and magazine interviews on retail food price trends.